In addition, feedback received in the course of the evaluation has pointed to the need of reducing the overlaps, contradictions and repetitive requirements, including in relation to other Union legislation, in order to provide more legal clarity and limit the administrative burden on the economic operators. It is therefore necessary to lay down more specific and detailed legal obligations for economic operators, as well as new provisions including as regards technical specifications and market surveillance, so that legal certainty is increased and that diverging interpretations are avoided. | Organisation for Technical Assessment have shown the underperformance of the framework in various respects, including as regards the development of standards and the market surveillance. |  | (12) Creating a Union market for small prefabricated one-family houses has a potential to reduce the price of housing and to have positive social and economic effects. Fairness to consumers remains a priority, specifically but not limited to ensuring affordability of housing in the context of the green transition, in line with Proposal for Council Recommendation on Ensuring a fair transition towards climate neutrality<sup>1</sup>, in particular recommendations 7 a)-c). It is therefore necessary to lay down harmonised rules for such small houses. However, small houses are also construction works, for which the Member States are competent. As it might not be possible to integrate cumulatively all national requirements for small prefabricated one-family houses into the future harmonised technical specifications, Member States should have the right to opt out of the application of rules that are to apply to those pre-fabricated one-family houses. _____ | deleted | deleted  |                 |

|                   | (54) The performance and safety of products also depend on the components used and on the services provided by calibrators or other service providers for their design and manufacturing. For these reasons, certain obligations should be established for suppliers of components and service providers involved in the manufacturing of products. Where a non-compliance or risk might have been caused by a supplied component or service of a certain economic operator, the supplier or service provider should inform thereof his other clients who have received the same component or service, so that non-compliances and risks can be effectively tackled for other products too. | deleted                                                                   | deleted  |                 |

As diverging decisions create an uneven playing field, contribute to rendering the legal framework more complex, create barriers to the free movement of the internal market and additional administrative burden and costs on economic operators, such diverging decisions should be prevented by that coordination mechanism. | (82) It is necessary to establish an appropriate, efficient and cost-effective coordination mechanism to ensure a consistent application of the obligations and requirements set and to strengthen the overall system, also taking into consideration the fact that new interpretative questions may arise in relation to safety and sustainability of products and construction works. As diverging decisions create an uneven playing field, contribute to rendering the legal framework more complex, create barriers to the free movement of the internal market and additional administrative burden and costs on economic operators, such diverging decisions should be prevented by that coordination mechanism. |                 |

| 95 | (86) Member States do not always have the technical competence to fulfil all obligations incumbent on them in accordance with Union legislation cumulatively for all product sectors. They therefore obtain informal support, from other bigger Member States. Since such support is unavoidable in some cases and advisable in others, this Regulation should set out the basic rules for such support, namely to clarify responsibilities. Moreover, Member States are challenged by the increasing technical complexity of products and the legislation applicable with regard to all aspects and product sectors cumulatively, which indicates a potential for better results by virtue of specialisation and work-sharing amongst Member States. This Regulation should therefore both reflect the particular situation of the Member States and allow exploring the potential added value of specialisation and work-sharing amongst any Member States. | (86) Member States do not always have the technical competence to fulfil all obligations incumbent on them in accordance with Union legislation cumulatively for all product sectors. | 96         | (87) Business on construction products becomes slowly but steadily more and more international. Hence, situations arise where non-compliances of economic operators based outside the Union need to be countered as well. As third countries hardly are ready to support the enforcement of Union law on their territory where the Union does not in return provide for the possibility to assist them, some empowerments for international cooperation should be provided for in this Regulation. | (87) Business on construction products becomes slowly but steadily more and more international. For this reason, it should be possible to support these particularly cooperative third countries by allowing them to participate in certain trainings and to participate in the EU construction products database or system, to the information system for harmonised decision-making and to the information exchange amongst authorities. Moreover, for the same reason, it should be possible to inform these particularly cooperative third countries about non-compliant or risky products. |                 |
