Such data support evidence-based decision-making across a wide range of policy areas, including biodiversity protection, water management, soil monitoring, pollution prevention and climate adaptation. They are also indispensable for monitoring progress towards relevant Union

16a		(3a) The availability, accessibility and interoperability of environmental spatial data can contribute significantly to reducing administrative burdens and improving the efficiency, quality and reliability of administrative procedures. Better access to environmental information can facilitate environmental assessments, permitting procedures and public decision-making processes, while maintaining a high level of environmental protection. The effective sharing and re-use of environmental information should therefore be regarded as an important component of better regulation and more efficient environmental governance.
