While there is currently no specific regulatory framework for the metaverse as the adoption of the metaverse expands and evolves, the risks of money laundering, terrorist financing and sanctions evasion substantially increase. Obligated entities should be aware of such risks and continue to comply with AML/CFT obligations when operating in virtual worlds, in relation to the activities and operations covered by this Regulation, such as legal professionals with experience in real estate, finance and intellectual property, which may get increasingly involved in such transactions, including when providing legal assistance or advice.

			mainly as a result from increases in television rights and corporate sponsorship. Simultaneously, the labour market for professional football players has experienced unprecedented globalisation – with more and more football players contracted by teams outside their country and transfer payments of astounding dimensions. The cross border money flows that are involved may largely fall outside the control of national and supranational football organisations, giving opportunities to move and launder money. At the same time money from private investors is pouring into football clubs to keep them operating and can give the investor long term returns in terms of media rights, ticket sales, proceeds of sales of players and merchandising." In its report of 24 July 2019 to the European Parliament and the Council on the assessment of the risk of money laundering and terrorist financing affecting the internal market and relating to cross-border activities, the Commission assessed professional football and stated that "whilst it remains a popular sport it is also a global industry with significant economic impact. 			by means of a regulated service providers, the level of traceability to a verified identity might not be sufficient for the purpose of preventing their misuse for money laundering, terrorist financing or predicate offences. The use of such means of payment, in the context of increasing digitalisation, might create a loophole and undermine the effectiveness of the cash limit. While maintaining the possibility to make payments in crypto-assets for goods and services, it is therefore necessary to require merchants to rely on a crypto-asset service provider authorised under MiCA, when accepting payments in crypto-assets. Such limitation should apply to persons trading in goods or providing services and should not be interpreted as a restriction on private transactions by means of self-hosted wallets nor as a restriction to the use of self-hosted wallets in the context of commercial transactions, as long as a crypto-asset service provider is involved.

Purpose is to have a broader definition of "funds" than the one used in FTR/PSD2. In AML legislation, "funds" is usually referred to as a "property" within the meaning of the Directing on criminalising money laundering (in line with FATF standard). There are some occurrences of "funds" in AMLR where clearly a "broader" meaning is meant. If no clarification provided, there is a risk of different interpretations. If introduced, technical re-drafting is needed to ensure consistency throughout the text.

			PUBLIC	Gambling activities vary in nature, geographical scope and associated risks. In order to ensure a proportionate and risk-based application of this Regulation, it should be possible for Member States to identify gambling services associated with low money laundering and terrorist financing risks, such as State or private lotteries, or State-administered gambling activities, and to decide not to apply all or some of the requirements of this Regulation to them. Given the potential cross-border effects of national exceptions, it is necessary to ensure a consistent application of a strict risk-based approach across the EU. To that end, the Commission should be enabled to approve Member States' decisions, or to reject them when the exception is not justified by a proven low risk. In any case, no exception should be granted in relation to activities associated with higher risks such as casinos, online gambling and sport betting. Proposal for compromise text with a new recital CONS and EP to check and revert CONS to revert EP to revert
