11a			(2a) Criminal organisations usually reinvest part of their profits from criminal activities to create a financial base enabling them to continue those activities. In addition, criminal organisations often resort to violence, threats or intimidation in order to acquire the control or management of economic activities, concessions, authorisations, procurement and public services, or to achieve illicit profits or advantages, thereby adversely affecting the freedom of competition, or to prevent or to hinder the free exercise of the right to vote or to otherwise alter voting results in elections, thus affecting democratic life. Organised crime has therefore become an economic worldwide operator with an entrepreneurial vocation and specialised in both the legal and illegal supply of goods and services. Other crimes which are often carried out within the framework of an organised crime group include murder or grievous bodily harm, as well as the illicit trade in human organs and tissue, which are a source of revenue for organised crime groups in the context of contract killings, intimidation and trafficking in human beings. Similarly kidnapping, illegal restraint or hostage taking, as well as racketeering and extortion, are utilized either as source of revenue through the collection of ransom money or as intimidation tactics against adversaries. The crime of organised or armed robbery is one of the most common forms to generate profits for organised criminal groups, and it is often committed in conjunction with other crimes, in particular the trafficking in firearms. Similarly, the trafficking in stolen vehicles cannot only generate profits but also represents an enabling crime to provide for the necessary instrumentalities to carry out further offences. In addition, it is key to include tax crimes to the extent it is committed as part of a criminal organisation in the scope of the Directive, as this specific crime is an enabling source of profits, especially when operating in a cross-border context.
