Currently, Article 56 only addresses cases where the payer is suspected of fraud and does not cover other possible (and far more common) reasons for refusing reimbursement of an unauthorized transaction, such as “gross negligence”. In other words, Article 56 does not talk with Article 60. For the sake of clarity, we underline that in our national experience (and thus not under a strictly “objective” approach), Art. 73 and Art. 74 PSD2 have led to a situation where the PSP refunds, within one business day, the full amount, but such refund is made “under reserve” (“salvo buon fine”). At a later stage (sometime after months) the PSP debits the PSU again, if it concludes (unilaterally) that there has been gross negligence on the part of the PSU. (After that, the PSU is free to bring the matter to the Courts or to an ADR scheme). This approach is consistent with the European Commission’s response to Q&A No. 223 here (albeit in the context of PSD1).

			Due to this lack of clear rules, a preliminary reference has been raised by a Polish Court (C-70/25 [Tukowiecka]) regarding the interpretation of Art. 73 and 74 PSD2. The key question is whether a PSP may refuse the reimbursement of an unauthorized transaction on the grounds that the PSU was grossly negligent or – as proposed by the national court – whether the PSP must first reimburse the PSU and then refer the matter to a court. If the national court’s interpretation were to be upheld by the CJEU, it could have an extremely significant impact on the application of the PSD2 across multiple MSs, where the PSP can debit the PSU again if “gross negligence” is established at a later stage. The existence of such widely divergent interpretations on an issue with significant implications for the implementation of PSD2 (a decade after its adoption) clearly highlights the need for a more detailed and coherent legal framework. This need is even more pressing given the innovations that the PSR will introduce.

			non-compliance with SCA: one approach would be to recognize that the T+1 rule is better suited for a stricter application of “objective theory”, which requires simpler and more automatable controls (roughly, compliance with SCA). Under a non-strictly objective approach, the PSP should have time to make a more complex assessments of the relevant circumstances. Accordingly, the T+1 rule could be limited to cases where SCA was not applied, , while in any other cases there would be a deadline by which the PSP should either refund the payer or justify the reasons for the refusal. 2. Proposal 2 - T+1 plus reclaim by the PSP: another approach would be to maintain the T+1 rule, in order to ensure that the reimbursement is prompt and to prevent PSPs from using the time needed to collect and assess
